had some unusual items in the bedroom in which he died.

The documentary Killing Michael Jackson premiered in the U. S. Monday on Bounce and explored the June 25, 2009 death of the King of Pop through the eyes of three L. A. P. D. detectives who led the investigation that determined he was the victim of a homicide. Jackson&#65533;s personal doctor, Conrad Murray, was convicted in 2011 of involuntary manslaughter for administering excessive doses of the powerful drug propofol to the iconic performer.

The detectives &#65533; Orlando Martinez, Dan Myers and Scott Smith &#65533; detailed their findings in the bedroom of Jackson&#65533;s rented Holmby Hills home, noting there was a realistic looking baby doll in the superstar&#65533;s bed &#65533; as well as a group of blown-up images of baby boys in the room. The room was described as Jackson&#65533;s home treatment room, though the detectives didn&#65533;t think it seemed appropriate for any type of medical treatment. There was an IV stand, saline bags, medications all over the room and a loose needle on the floor.

Det. Martinez detailed the scene, in a clip obtained by Daily Beast, saying, &#65533;There was a computer on the bed&#65533; there was&#65533; kind of, like, advertisements of pictures with babies. Everybody knew about the allegations that had been leveled against Mr. Jackson over the years. One of the things, when I saw the laptop on the bed&#65533; do I go into it? But you have to realize the type of case I was investigating. &#65533; Det. Myers said they stayed focused on their immediate crime investigation, saying, &#65533;It&#65533;s like with any case: You don&#65533;t allow whatever the victim was into prior to his death . Your investigation is focused on: How did he die? And, who was responsible for it? &#65533;
