

Re: Mixed feelings on "Donor Unknown"

Posted by arco - 2011/11/08 12:23

A great documentary that made me think about the make-up of the modern American family. I can't help to think that even though father Jeffrey, his offspring, and their families would be considered "non-traditional" by even liberal standards of family, they face the same problems and feelings that all families do: secrecy, love, lack of trust, being too judgemental, friendship, regrets...

The ethical issues raised in this film are obvious. I'm sure there is a great sense of togetherness and closure that the siblings gained from meeting Jeffrey, but it seemed that the daughter from Maryland had a deeper need to see her surrogate father. Could it be because she was one of the youngest and farthest away? One of the other older girls didn't seem to sad to part Jeffrey because she said only "lived two hours" away in California and she had seen him before. Does locality and age slowly kill the need to be near a long lost relative? I'm sure it can in traditional families just as easily in one that started in a SoCal sperm bank.

Nothing against Jeffrey, but one wonders how many young people in their early twenties are walking the streets with half of his gene pool. Then again, one wonders how many test tube babies are walking the streets from any donor. It's got to be in the millions by now. The first test-tube baby, who was conceived in vitro fertilization around 1980 in England, recently celebrated her 30th birthday. Imagine how many donors of both egg and sperm have set their DNA loose in the past 30 years. And this is a world-wide phenomenon.

I guess in the end, the only people who don't directly have to deal with the ethical implications is the $4 billion gamete industry. I'm sure they would argue with that, but hey, once the donor signs the agreement, does his or her duty into a plastic cup and the check is in the mail, it's just another number to the gamete industry. Unregulated, no one keeping track of the numbers, everybody(gamete industry, couples, donors) seals the deal and is satisfied. Except those unborn and their future questions...who is my real daddy? Where is my biological mother?

=====

Re: Mixed feelings on "Donor Unknown"

Posted by Snowman - 2012/04/03 04:43

This is an excellent documentary (it still going on), but it has already made me a little angry: here I am sitting on the couch in the middle of the night, at my home in Helsinki Finland, with the tv open and a lap-top on... and all of a sudden I start concentrating in to this film. What the hell?? This sounds like a big accident!

I think every child has the right to know their biological father.

If I would not know who my dad was, I would be very pissed to my mom. Thank god I have married parents, both still alive in their 80's.

Somehow the whole sperm-donor industry gives me the creeps...

The moms are very selfish when accepting sperm from someone who's identity will never be revealed to the child.

=====

Re: Mixed feelings on "Donor Unknown"

Posted by yohanaw - 2012/04/14 16:31

(1) A thought provoking documentary. Among connecting moments witnessed is when LuEllen gives Jeffrey a photo from her visit to the nursing home of her biological grandfather (his late long estranged father). (2) Of course this film about sperm donation can be applied to other areas of hidden genetic family information such as closed adoption and oocyte donation as well as to not ethical technological progress size=-3>

=====

=====

