We◆ve seen enough so far to start making some broad-strokes judgments, analyses that rely on data rather than gut feelings. And it◆s in that spirit that I offer this utterly logical take: It◆s time to fire the entire NFC East into the sun. No, I◆m serious. Pack ◆em all in. Dallas, Philly, the Giants, Washington ◆ load ◆em up and shoot ◆em into orbit. Forfeit all the rest of their games ◆ it◆s not like they were going to win much of them anyway ◆ and give their playoff spot to, I don◆t know, Alabama or something. This is a division that◆s incompetent (New York), infuriating (Washington), indecisive (Phiiladelphia) and incomprehensible (Dallas). New York appears utterly directionless; Washington is just a swampy mess that not even Ron Rivera can clean up; Philadelphia has suffered through decimating injuries; and Dallas clearly lost its heart and soul when it lost Dak Prescott. All four teams combined have five wins. That◆s the same as the Seahawks, Bears, Steelers, Ravens, Titans and Chiefs. Again: the Chicago Bears have won as many games this year as the entire NFC East.  The division is a combined 5-18-1. To get the division above .500, every single member of the NFC East would have to win every single game from now to Week 11, in mid-December.  Outside the division, the NFC East teams have only two wins: Dallas over Atlanta, which was a gift from the Falcons, and Philly with a five-point victory over San Francisco, which is 3-3 on the season. Yes, the best opponent anyone in the division has beaten doesn◆t even have a winning record.  The NFC East is the only division in football that is completely underwater ◆ in other words, every team has totaled fewer points on the year than their opponents. The average point differential across the division for the season is -46. The Eagles are the ◆best◆ of this bunch, and even they have scored 34 fewer points than their opponents.       shopusacigarettes.com]Online Cigarettes Store USA=====
